Advies van het visitatiepanel

Samenvatting bevindingen en overwegingen van het panel.

The panel considers EMLE a well-established programme which has well-documented its joint programme cooperation. This is exemplified by the comprehensiveness of their cooperation agreement. The programme has a cautious approach to the legal frameworks in which it operates and this is appreciated by the panel. The panel also highly values the self-reflective attitude of the consortium towards the added value of the joint programme.

Pagina 2 van 5 The programme's intended learning outcomes correspond with the overarching qualification frameworks and thus enable graduates to perform the Economic Analysis of Law. They also accommodate the fact that most of the students come in with either a legal or an economic background. EMLE clearly has a tradition of developing and evaluating learning outcomes. The panel lauds the programme's approach to include all stakeholders, not only in continuing its development but also in evaluating its learning outcomes, and to involve the professional field in a structural and coherent manner.

The programme has well-documented its admission and selection procedure, including criteria in which different disciplinary and national backgrounds are accommodated. The curriculum more than appropriately incorporates many different perspectives and clashing disciplinary opinions. The panel appreciates how the programme has matched its credit distribution with an appropriate grading table.

The internal quality assurance system has been found to be well-developed. The panel commendably refers to this system as a "bureaucratic red carpet". The programme is self-critical and self-reflective. It has carefully and increasingly involved its stakeholders in its quality assurance system and uses second markers when assessing students. The programme has a permanent and incremental approach to improvement including a focus on benchmarking.

The joint programme provides facilities and services that purposefully facilitate its students. The programme has a shared approach to provide student support across the locations, from a welcome week to an ombudsman. Access to study material and research articles is harmonised and all provided services are well-documented.

The staff of the EMLE programme are well-known, excellent scholars. They use regulations that ensure the consistent and transparent assessment of students' learning. Since many joint programmes still lack uniformity in their marking, the panel lauds EMLE's use of second, and sometimes even third, marking in addition to the EMLE ECTS Grading Table. The panel read a random, differentiated selection of the master's theses of the last two years. These indeed demonstrate that graduates achieve EMLE's intended learning outcomes.

To conclude, students in this joint programme study a coherent curriculum taught by excellent staff and supported by beneficial services and facilities. These elements enable students to achieve EMLE's intended learning outcomes, which the panel considers to be at master's level and enable performing Economic Analysis of Law. A systematic approach to internal quality assurance contributes demonstrably to a consistent improvement perspective within the consortium. The programme has a transparent and coherent student assessment system, which clearly demonstrates that EMLE students achieve the intended learning outcomes.
