WORKING METHOD OF THE ASSESSMENT PANEL

The Law Assessment

The master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations at the Faculty of Law of the University of Groningen was assessed as part of the Law cluster assessment. Between October of 2017 and March of 2018, three panels assessed a total of 92 programmes at eleven universities. Upon consultation with the NVAO, it was decided that for the assessment within the umbrella group Domain of Law, three subclusters (henceforth: clusters) of institutions would be created:

Cluster I	University of Amsterdam, VU University Amsterdam, Erasmus University Rotterdam, Nyenrode Business Universiteit;

Coordination and secretaries

Dr. Fiona Schouten acted as executive coordinator of the Law assessment, drs. Linda te Marvelde as supervisor and Marcella van Schie MA as project assistant. Drs. José van Zwieten (University of Amsterdam, Vrije Universiteit Amsterdam) and dr. Marianne van der Weiden (Erasmus University Rotterdam, Nyenrode Business Universiteit) acted as secretaries in cluster I; Adrienne Wieldraaijer-Huijzer MA (Leiden University) and dr. Floor Meijer (Tilburg University, Utrecht University) in cluster II; and drs. Renate Prenen (Maastricht University, Open University, Radboud University Nijmegen, University of Groningen) in cluster III. Due to parallel sessions in the site visit schedules, Fiona Schouten acted as additional secretary during the visits to Erasmus University Rotterdam, the University of Amsterdam, Maastricht University and Radboud University Nijmegen. She also acted as additional secretary during the visit to the University of Groningen due to planned name changes of various programmes.

Consistency and calibration

In order to assure the assessments took place consistently within and between clusters, various measures were taken:

1. The QANU coordinator was present at the start of all site visits as well as at the panel discussion leading to the preliminary findings at every site visit;
2. The coordinator was present at the first site visit of every cluster;
3. Calibration meetings took place on 8 December 2017 and 6 April 2018. During these meetings, the panel chairs, vice chairs, student members and QANU coordinator discussed the working method and the assessments;
4. The chairs attended at least one site visit outside their own cluster as a spectator;

5. The student members of the panels rotated: they took part in at least one site visit per cluster;
6. Prior to the site visits, on 29 August 2017, coordinator and secretaries held a meeting to discuss their working method.

Preparation

On 23 March 2017, the panel chairs were briefed by QANU on the working method, assessment frameworks and planning of the Law assessment. They also discussed mutual coordination and communication. This led to a shared directive on the selection of theses and to a description of the nature and number of courses to be selected as study material during each site visit.

A preparatory meeting was organised on 19 June 2017 for the members of the three panels. During this meeting, the panel members received instruction on the assessment frameworks and the planning of the site visits. They reflected upon the content and use of the domain-specific framework of reference (see appendix 2).

In preparing the site visit to the University of Groningen, the coordinator and the panel chair made a selection of theses of the programmes under assessment. These were chosen from a list of graduates between 01/09/2015 and 31/08/2017. The selection followed the NVAO guideline for the assessment of theses and took the range of thesis subjects, tracks, supervisors and grades into account. The panel studied the selected theses and the assessment forms.

In consultation with the contact persons from the Faculty of Law, the coordinator drafted a programme for the site visit (see appendix 5). The Faculty of Law selected representative discussion partners for the interviews. The panel and coordinator agreed with this selection.

Upon receiving the critical reflections, the coordinator checked their quality and content before sending them to the panel. The panel members studied the documents and formulated questions and preliminary findings. These were collected by the secretary, who arranged them according to subject matter.

Site visit

The site visit to the University of Groningen took place from 22 – 25 January 2018. During the visit, the panel studied documents provided by the contact person of the University of Groningen (cf. appendix 6). The panel interviewed programme management, students, staff members, alumni and representatives of the programme committee and the board of examiners. The panel also offered staff members and students the opportunity to speak to the panel confidentially upon prior request. No requests were received for this consultation hour.

At the end of the site visit, the panel held an internal meeting to formulate its preliminary findings. The panel chair concluded the site visit with a public presentation of the panel's findings.

Report

After the site visit, the secretary produced a draft version of the report based on the panel's findings. The coordinator sent this to the panel members. After their commentary was processed, the coordinator sent the report to the University of Groningen to check for factual errors. The response of the university was discussed with the panel chair; changes to the report were made based on his request. The report was then finalised and sent to the Faculty of Law and the University of Groningen.

Definition of judgements standards

In accordance with the NVAO's Assessment framework for limited programme assessments, the panel used the following definitions for the assessment of both the standards and the programme as a whole.

Generic quality

The quality that, from an international point of view, can reasonably be expected from a higher education bachelor's or master's programme.

Unsatisfactory

The programme does not meet the current generic quality standards and shows serious shortcomings in several areas.

Satisfactory

The programme meets the current generic quality standards and shows an acceptable level across its entire spectrum.

Good

The programme systematically surpasses the current generic quality standard.

Excellent

The programme systematically well surpasses the current generic quality standard and is regarded as an international example.

SUMMARY JUDGEMENT

Intended learning outcomes

According to the panel, the intended learning outcomes of the master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations (ILLIO) are in line with the subject-specific reference framework as well as the international Dublin descriptors. It appreciates the attention paid to the broader context in which (inter)national (non-)governmental organizations or internationally operating companies function. It is positive about the programme's new profile with the two tracks: the more generally oriented track of Public International Law and the International Human Rights Law track. It is pleased to observe that the new programme is attracting more students than the former ILLIO programme. However, it feels the small scale as well as the competition from other programmes make ILLIO somewhat vulnerable in terms of viability. It advises the faculty to re-evaluate ILLIO's position and profile in this context, particularly with regard to the other English-language master's programmes.

Teaching-learning environment

The panel established that the master's programme ILLIO is adequately designed and enables the students to achieve the intended learning outcomes. The curriculum gives students the opportunity to choose a track and optional courses and thereby design their own programme in a manner that suits their academic interests and career plans. Coherence is safeguarded through mandatory courses and by limiting the number of electives. The content suits a master's level and shows an adequate balance between academic and professional knowledge and skills. Students have sufficient opportunities to apply knowledge and insights and to train their legal, academic and professional skills. The link to the professional field is established through the use of real-life or practice-oriented cases and assignments and the contribution of lecturers and guest lecturers with practical experience. It is enhanced by the extracurricular Law in Practice course unit and the various career orientation activities in collaboration with the study association.

The design of the individual courses is based on a lecturer-oriented didactic model with an emphasis on non-compulsory lectures. The panel understands this but feels that it allows students to adopt a less active attitude towards their studies and delay much of the course work until just before exams. It advises exploring ways to activate students. The programme is feasible, and the success rates are acceptable. Students are satisfied with the teaching and guidance provided by the staff. They also appreciate the large amount of guidance and support they receive from the faculty's International Office. The panel recommends exploring how the students' learning process could benefit more from this international environment. It established that some students experience delay when writing their thesis, which is partly due to a lack of firm deadlines in the thesis process. It advises the programme to consider introducing a more regulated thesis process. With respect to the size of the master's thesis, the panel advises a reduction of the currently large number of credits (18 EC), for example to 12 EC. A further point of concern is that some foreign students have had fewer opportunities to acquire and practice skills in their previous education and experience difficulty writing their thesis and/or other papers and assignments. Students in the International Human Rights Law track particularly struggle with the seminar, which is scheduled at the start of the programme. The panel advises moving the seminar to the second half of the programme in order to give students and staff more time to prepare for it. In general, it recommends considering how the students in question could be better guided and supervised.

The panel values the professional, scientific and didactic qualities of the staff members and the attention paid to their professionalization. It appreciates the flat organisation structure with a pleasant and collegial work climate in which many matters are discussed informally. It considers the staff-student ratio to be a cause for concern and recommends monitoring the workload of the staff and acting promptly to correct any problems.

Assessment

The panel confirmed that the assessment and evaluation system of the master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations functions adequately. The content of the exams demonstrates an adequate master's level. The panel approves the types of assessment used. They are sufficiently varied and suit the content and design of the programme. Feedback on written assignments, including the master's thesis, could be improved. The evaluation of the theses is done properly, although the assessment form used could be made more transparent by clarifying the relation between the assessment of individual criteria and the overall score and by including space for qualitative remarks. The panel advises considering the introduction of a public oral thesis defense. It found some differences in the grading of written exams, papers and theses among the international master's programmes, including ILLIO. The panel advises organising a better calibration of the grading.

The quality control of assessment and evaluation is good. The panel approves the programme dossier, which reveals the relationship between the intended learning outcomes of the programme as a whole and the learning objectives, content and assessment of the individual courses. It also appreciated the various measures implemented to promote the reliability, validity and clarity of assessment, such as the four-eyes principle

Achieved learning outcomes

The panel studied a selection of theses and found that the awarded grades generally matched its own evaluations. It concluded that the level achieved in the theses is satisfactory. They demonstrate a sufficiently academic attitude and understanding. They also testify to considerable skill in executing research and reporting on it. The interviewed alumni were positive about their programme, and the panel established that they are quite successful in their careers

The panel assesses the standards from the Assessment framework for limited programme assessments in the following way:

Master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations

Standard 1: Intended learning outcomes	satisfactory
Standard 2: Teaching-learning environment	satisfactory
Standard 3: Assessment	satisfactory
Standard 4: Achieved learning outcomes	satisfactory
General conclusion	satisfactory

The chair and the secretary of the panel hereby declare that all panel members have studied this report and that they agree with the judgements laid down in the report. They confirm that the assessment has been conducted in accordance with the demands relating to independence.

DESCRIPTION OF THE STANDARDS FROM THE ASSESSMENT FRAMEWORK FOR LIMITED PROGRAMME ASSESSMENTS

Organisation

The Faculty of Law of the University of Groningen offers two bachelor's programmes and eleven master's programmes, which were assessed in the Law cluster assessment (2017-2018). The Faculty Board consists of the Dean, the Vice-Dean Academic, the Vice-Dean Administrative, the Faculty Secretary, and a student member. The Director of Education is accountable to the Faculty Board. He is responsible for the further development (innovation) and execution of the educational programmes of the Faculty. The academic staff of the faculty is organised in the following departments: General Law Studies and History of Law; Business Law and European Law; Private Law and Notarial Law; Legal Theory; International Law; Constitutional Law, Administrative Law and Public Administration; Criminal Law and Criminology; and Transboundary Legal Studies. The programmes use Faculty services such as the Student Administration and Student Affairs Office (which includes the information desk, the International Office, the study progress administration, the study advisers, the Official Secretariat Board of Examiners, and the course and examination enrolment administration). Each programme has its own Programme Committee, Admission Committee and Advisory Board. There is a single Board of Examiners serving all degree programmes.

Standard 1: Intended learning outcomes

The intended learning outcomes of the programme have been concretised with regard to content, level and orientation; they meet international requirements.

Explanation:

As for level and orientation (bachelor's or master's; professional or academic), the intended learning outcomes fit into the Dutch qualifications framework. In addition, they tie in with the international perspective of the requirements currently set by the professional field and the discipline with regard to the contents of the programme. Insofar as is applicable, the intended learning outcomes are in accordance with relevant legislation and regulations.

Findings

The master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations (ILLIO) is a one-year, English-taught master's programme (60 EC) leading to an LL.M degree. According to the critical reflection, societal changes and the need to formulate effective answers to pressing national and international concerns demand new solutions which in one way or another involve law and governance at the international level. This requires original and innovative thinking, skills to investigate and present solutions, the ability to explore inter- and multidisciplinary approaches, and the willingness to look beyond traditional boundaries (geographical and academic). The increased complexities of the international society call for a new generation of dedicated, young, international lawyers. ILLIO aspires to make a relevant contribution to this aim.

Graduates of the programme are expected to possess specialised knowledge and understanding of international and human rights law, and to apply such knowledge and understanding to the issues and problems that may arise within the scope of their activities. Although the programme and its specialisation prepare them for the performance of predominantly legal functions, graduates will often operate in a policy-oriented environment and may thus have to transcend the boundaries of legal opinion and judgement. It is precisely for this reason that graduates from the programme ought to be able to place the more specifically legal issue(s) in the societal context within which law operates, and to appreciate the socio-economic or international relations context so as to be able to work and cooperate effectively with policy advisers or in a multi-disciplinary setting in general.

The master's degree programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations has existed since 1995. It was developed to teach about the international regulation of relations between States, international organizations and other non-state actors. A specialisation in human rights law within this programme was introduced in 2005. It intended to draw upon the major influence that human rights law had started to exert over all other sub-disciplines of international law. The programme was revised once more in 2014. The focus has shifted in its presentation more towards a general public international law programme than a programme that explicitly focuses on international organizations. All this led to two tracks within the master International Law and the Law of International Organizations: the track Public International Law and the track International Human Rights Law. The next step will be to change the name of the LLM programme into 'Public International Law'. A request for approval of this title has been submitted to the NVAO.

The panel is positive about the programme's profile, which it considers sufficiently ambitious and academic. It considers the creation of the two tracks, the more generally oriented track of Public International Law and that of International Human Rights Law, an adequate adjustment to changes in academic as well as professional demand. The human rights track in particular contributes to the creation of a distinctive profile. The new programme's name reflects better what is actually being taught. The panel thinks that the new course is more attractive to prospective students. It is pleased to see that since the two tracks were introduced, the student numbers have improved. However, student numbers remain low (see Standard 2), and the programme is facing increased competition from programmes offered by other universities and from the other ten master's programmes offered at the University of Groningen's Faculty of Law. According to the panel, the small scale as well as the competition from other programmes make ILLIO somewhat vulnerable in terms of viability. It advises the faculty to re-evaluate ILLIO's position and profile in this context, particularly with regard to the other English-language master's programmes.

The panel studied the intended learning outcomes (cf. appendix 3) and ascertained that they are in agreement with the subject-specific reference framework (cf. appendix 2) and can be linked to the international Dublin descriptors for the master's level. The outcomes are therefore in accordance with national as well as international standards. The learning outcomes distinguish where necessary between students of the two tracks. The panel appreciates the attention paid in the learning outcomes to the broader context in which international law functions and to the various perspectives on the role of public international law and international law specialists in international society or, more specifically, the field of human rights law (outcome A3). According to the panel, gaining insight into this broader context in which (inter)national (non-)governmental organizations or internationally operating companies function is essential for the programme's graduates.

Considerations

According to the panel, the intended learning outcomes of the master's programme ILLIO are in line with the subject-specific reference framework as well as the international Dublin descriptors. It appreciates the attention paid to the broader context in which (inter)national (non-)governmental organizations or internationally operating companies function. It is positive about the programme's new profile with the two tracks: the more generally oriented track of Public International Law and the International Human Rights Law track. It is pleased to observe that the new programme is attracting more students than the former ILLIO programme. However, it feels the small scale as well as the competition from other programmes make ILLIO somewhat vulnerable in terms of viability. It advises the faculty to re-evaluate ILLIO's position and profile in this context, particularly with regard to the other English-language master's programmes.

Conclusion

Master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations: the panel assesses Standard 1 as 'satisfactory'.

Standard 2: Teaching-learning environment

The curriculum, staff and programme-specific services and facilities enable the incoming students to achieve the intended learning outcomes.

Explanation:

The contents and structure of the curriculum enable the students admitted to achieve the intended learning outcomes. The quality of the staff and of the programme-specific services and facilities is essential to that end. Curriculum, staff, services and facilities constitute a coherent teaching-learning environment for the students.

Findings*Curriculum content and design*

ILLIO is a one-year, full-time, selective master's programme (60 EC). To be admitted to the programme, students must have completed a law-based undergraduate degree, comprising several modules of public international law. Successful candidates must have a minimum GPA of 7/10 or equivalent. Proven command of the English language is also required for admission. The influx for the new International Law and the Law of International Organizations: Public International Law programme was 22 in the academic year 2015-2016 and 36 in the academic year 2016-2017. A lot of students are foreign and come from all over the world.

The programme of the Public International Law track consists of 5 compulsory courses, 1 elective, the compulsory International Law in Practice seminar and the master's thesis. All courses, including the seminar, are worth 6 EC. The master's thesis is 18 EC. The programme is set up to lay the necessary theoretical and conceptual foundations in the first half of the year, especially in Advanced International Law, the Law of the United Nations (International Institutional Law and UN Peacekeeping and Peace Enforcement) and Settlement of International Disputes. Having laid the groundwork, the specialised courses in the second half of the programme aim to provide students with knowledge of substantive fields of international law and to raise awareness of the societal problems within such sub-disciplines and the scope available for law to contribute to their solution. Students can choose one out of four optional courses. The seminar is a practical in which students have to write papers/assignments, and present and discuss them under the supervision of an expert in the field. Students have to perform independent legal research in this seminar. They conclude their programme with the master's thesis, in which they demonstrate their mastery of the legal and academic skills required.

The programme of the International Human Rights Law track starts with the same two courses as the Public International Law track: International Human Rights Law and International Institutional Law. The programmes then diverge. International Human Rights is also designed to provide strong theoretical and conceptual foundations in the first half through International Human Rights Law, the Human Rights seminar, International Health Law, and the institutional frameworks (International Institutional Law and International Criminal Tribunals and Courts). The second half of the programme is reserved for electives and the master's thesis. The elective space allows for a limited choice of courses: students choose one out of two specialised courses twice. These specialised courses consider human rights aspects within more specific contexts, such as the health sector, armed conflict, migration (mass), the European region, and the criminal accountability for serious human rights violations. The specialised courses attempt to raise awareness of the human rights problems within those specific contexts and explore the scope available for human rights law to contribute to their solution. Appendix 4 shows an overview of the programmes of both tracks.

The panel is positive about the programme's design. With the two tracks and electives, students have the opportunity to tailor their programme to their individual interests, needs and future careers. Coherence is safeguarded by the compulsory courses and the limited choice of electives. The panel also appreciates the fact that the more generally relevant courses are scheduled in the first half of the academic year, followed by the electives in the second half.

The content of the programme suits a master's level and enables students to achieve the intended learning outcomes. There is an adequate balance between academic versus professional knowledge and skills. The lecturers in the fields of public international law and/or human rights law use their research in their teaching. The emphasis is on putting knowledge and understanding to good use, instead of reproducing facts, figures and rules. Students are constantly challenged to find, analyse and/or reflect upon solutions to problems in international law and regional or international human rights law. At various stages of the programme, they have to use and develop their research and legal skills: when participating in various courses requiring the production and presentation of papers, when participating in the seminar and when writing their master's thesis. With respect to the link to the professional field, the panel established that this is enhanced by the application of practical (real-life) cases and assignments. Where relevant, the professional experience of lecturers is reflected in the course content. Furthermore, there is a constant effort to maintain links with the legal practice, notably through guest lecturers.

During the site visit the panel spoke with the management about the size of the master's thesis in relation to the number of credits. With 18 EC, the thesis takes up a lot of space in the curriculum. The theses the panel studied did not reflect this large number of credits very clearly (see Standard 4). The panel also questions the learning effect of such a high number of credits. It suggests reducing the size of the thesis. A reduction to, for example, 12 EC would have no adverse consequences on the learning effect.

Extracurricular course units and employability

As mentioned in the critical reflection, all students in the programme have the option of taking extracurricular course units, mostly courses from other LLM programmes, or to participate in the Law in Practice course unit. This could entail taking an extracurricular internship or participating in certain law-related activities such as law clinics or a moot court competition (national and/or international). ILLIO internships are placed in such institutions as ministries of foreign affairs, international courts and tribunals, and the Red Cross. The panel noted that it is harder for international students to find an internship than for Dutch students. International students mentioned they would appreciate it if they could get more support in finding an internship. The panel recommends looking into this.

A special career adviser was appointed in 2015 to promote paying attention to the career perspective of students. This career adviser has instigated a learning community for internships. This learning community supports students in the orientation stage for internships and provides them with information on possible future careers. There is also an online community for those who actually take up an internship, where they can support one another by sharing experiences. The community offers a number of instruments for students to get a better view of the job market, such as the Career Service Law website. Study associations are also vital in providing students with career orientation activities. In May 2017 the study association for international law students, Nexus, successfully organised the first Nexus Career Day. During the site visit the panel had an extra interview about the theme 'employability' with representatives of the study associations, the programme director and the career adviser. It is enthusiastic about the various initiatives. It particularly appreciates the fruitful collaboration between the faculty and the study associations. It is also positive about the career adviser's position.

Teaching concept and methods

The critical reflection describes a didactic concept developed by the Faculty of Law for all law programmes, in which knowledge transfer plays a key role. At the start of the bachelor's programme, direct instruction by lecturers is the teaching method used to ensure efficient knowledge transfer by an expert teaching staff. This is built upon until at the end of the bachelor's programme, students are challenged to contribute more of their own opinions to the legal discussions. The master's programme is aimed at a more in-depth study of a jurisdiction or field of specialization. The focus is not only on the acquisition of state-of-the-art knowledge, but also on the development of a critical and reflective attitude with regard to the organisation and functioning of the legal system. In the master's phase, lectures are the dominant teaching method. Legal discussion and reflection are primarily facilitated in the seminars.

During the site visit, the panel discussed the didactic concept and the teaching methods extensively with ILLIO students and staff members. It found that the faculty's didactic vision is well supported and offers a solid framework for discussion and further shaping of the teaching. It did ascertain that the choice for a lecturer-oriented didactic model in combination with the teaching methods used and the limited number of contact hours (174 per year, or 4.1 per week based on 42 scheduled teaching weeks) allows students to adopt a less active attitude towards their studies. As explained by the students, there are only a few lectures a week. These lectures are not mandatory, and students may put off serious studying until just before the exams. Students of ILLIO mentioned to the panel that the courses in the second half of the programme tend to be more interactive than those in the first, where lectures are the dominant teaching method. A notable exception is International Health Law in block 2 of the International Human Rights track. In this course, students were asked to design and teach one of the classes. The panel considers this a positive example for the other courses of the programme.

The panel considers the active processing and application of the course material essential for an optimal learning process and appreciates the staff's initiatives to make the teaching more active and interactive. It appears, though, that more can still be done. The panel advises the faculty to explore ways to further activate the students. It notes that the input and efforts of the party on the receiving end of the process of knowledge transfer, the students, are as important as those of the transferring party, the lecturers. Managing the expectations of students well is an essential part of this process and also requires attention. For example, by labelling an educational meeting as a lecture, students will tend not to prepare as well and assume a more passive attitude than they would for a working group.

Feasibility

The panel ascertained that the programme is feasible based on the information in the critical reflection and on talks with the students and lecturers. The university-wide implementation of the block system has led to a more even distribution of the teaching load over the year. Each block of 10 weeks has a load of 15 EC with two parallel courses. As explained by the lecturers, it is still too soon to draw firm conclusions, but there is a strong impression that it is discouraging procrastination and competition for students' attention between courses. The success rates per course confirm that the students do progress through their course and that there are no subjects with a high failure rate. According to the panel, the overall success rates are acceptable. On average, 53% of the students graduate within one year and 81% within two years.

The interviewed students confirmed the panel's positive impression. They considered the programme to be doable within one academic year and did not detect any stumbling blocks. Students' delays are often the result of following extra courses, an internship or a second study. They are satisfied with the guidance and support provided by the staff. They also expressed their great appreciation for the generous guidance and support they received from the faculty's International Office. They can turn to this office at any time if they are in need of support with regard to their programme or a personal situation affecting their studies.

The master's programme ILLIO has a very international student population. As the panel experienced during the site visit, most international students are very dedicated and involved. They are eager to learn by working together, participating and interacting during classes. The panel considers the international student environment to be an important asset of the programme. It contributes to a positive and stimulating educational climate in which students from different cultural and educational backgrounds can learn with and from each other. Moreover, this mixed international classroom allows students to widen their legal perspective and broaden their knowledge and understanding by learning about other countries and cultures. The panel recommends exploring how the students' learning process could benefit more from this international environment.

One point of concern is the process of the master's thesis. Talks with the students and alumni revealed that the students are usually expected to take the initiative and that it is their own responsibility to submit their thesis on time. Some students and alumni enjoyed this challenge and did not experience any difficulty with their thesis planning and progress. Other students and alumni were more hesitant and mentioned they would have appreciated a clear structure with strict deadlines. The panel ascertained that the high level of self-reliance and personal responsibility expected of students in the thesis project could have negative consequences for the students' study progress. It recommends making the thesis process more intensive and transparent, perhaps making use of the best practice within the faculty and university. It noted that the thesis process of the master's programme Recht en Bestuur, with more fixed guidance, feedback moments and submission deadlines, has led to good results. Otherwise, the interviewed students and alumni expressed their satisfaction with the nature of the supervision provided by the supervisors.

A further point of concern is the panel's observation that ILLIO builds on the faculty's bachelor's programmes, such as International and European Law, and assumes a certain skills level. Some foreign students have had fewer opportunities to acquire and practice skills in their previous education, and experience difficulties writing their thesis and/or other papers and assignments. Students of the International Human Rights Law track particularly struggle with the seminar, because this is placed right at the beginning of the programme. The seminar of the Public International Law track is planned during the second half of the programme. According to the panel, this fits better as there is more time to prepare students for their seminar and final thesis. It advises reconsidering the place of the seminar in the International Human Rights Law track. In general, it recommends closely monitoring the performances of foreign students who appear to lack essential research skills and, if necessary, to take further measures.

Teaching staff

The panel studied the composition of the teaching staff involved in the master's programme ILLIO as presented in the critical reflection. During the visit it also discussed the quality and quantity of the staff with the management, teachers and students. It is satisfied with the quality of the staff. It ascertained that 88% of the teaching staff in the Public International Law track has doctorates, as does 100% of the teaching staff in the International Human Rights Law track. It appreciates that all of them engage in original research and bring the results of this research into the classroom. This guarantees an adequate scientific anchoring of the programme. The panel also appreciates the fact that attention is paid to the didactical expertise of the staff, although there is room for improvement: at the time of the site visit, 63% of the staff teaching in the Public International Law track had obtained the University Teaching Qualification ('basiskwalificatie onderwijs'); in the Public International Law track, this was 83%. Teachers in key positions are given the opportunity to obtain a senior teaching qualification. Teachers can also apply for an educational sciences programme. The interviewed students are in general positive about the staff. They explicitly mentioned the scientific and professional expertise of the staff as well as their enthusiasm, accessibility and involvement.

From the talk with the management, it became apparent that additional investments had reduced the faculty's staff-student ratio in the past period from 1:51 to 1:45. The panel appreciates this and confirmed that the current number of staff members is sufficient to adequately conduct the various programmes, including ILLIO. It nevertheless considers the staff-student ratio to be a cause for concern. It advises the management to monitor the workload of the staff and to act promptly to correct any problems.

Considerations

The panel established that the master's programme ILLIO is adequately designed and enables the students to achieve the intended learning outcomes. The curriculum gives students the opportunity to choose a track and optional courses and thereby design their own programme in a manner that suits their academic interests and career plans. Coherence is safeguarded through mandatory courses and by limiting the number of electives. The content suits a master's level and shows an adequate balance between academic and professional knowledge and skills. Students have sufficient opportunities to apply knowledge and insights and to train their legal, academic and professional skills. The link to the professional field is established through the use of real-life or practice-oriented cases and assignments and the contribution of lecturers and guest lecturers with practical experience. It is enhanced by the extracurricular Law in Practice course unit and the various career orientation activities in collaboration with the study association.

The design of the individual courses is based on a lecturer-oriented didactic model with an emphasis on non-compulsory lectures. The panel understands this but feels that it allows students to adopt a less active attitude towards their studies and delay much of the course work until just before exams. It advises exploring ways to activate students. The programme is feasible, and the success rates are acceptable. Students are satisfied with the teaching and guidance provided by the staff. They also appreciate the large amount of guidance and support they receive from the faculty's International Office. The panel recommends exploring how the students' learning process could benefit more from this international environment. It established that some students experience delay when writing their thesis, which is partly due to a lack of firm deadlines in the thesis process. It advises the programme to consider introducing a more regulated thesis process. With respect to the size of the master's thesis, the panel advises a reduction of the currently large number of credits (18 EC), for example to 12 EC. A further point of concern is that some foreign students have had fewer opportunities to acquire and practice skills in their previous education and experience difficulty writing their thesis and/or other papers and assignments. Students in the International Human Rights Law track particularly struggle with the seminar, which is scheduled at the start of the programme. The panel advises moving the seminar to the second half of the programme in order to give students and staff more time to prepare for it. In general, it recommends considering how the students in question could be better guided and supervised.

The panel values the professional, scientific and didactic qualities of the staff members and the attention paid to their professionalization. It appreciates the flat organisation structure with a pleasant and collegial work climate in which many matters are discussed informally. It considers the staff-student ratio to be a cause for concern and recommends monitoring the workload of the staff and acting promptly to correct any problems.

Conclusion

Master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations: the panel assesses Standard 2 as 'satisfactory'.

Standard 3: Assessment

The programme has an adequate assessment system in place.

Explanation:

The tests and assessments are valid, reliable and transparent to the students. The programme's examining board safeguards the quality of the interim and final tests administered.

Findings

Assessment system

The panel reviewed the faculty's assessment policy. According to this policy, assessment in the bachelor's and master's programmes builds up 'from simple to complex' and from knowledge reproduction to independent understanding and reflection. The assessment system of the master's programme ILLIO is in line with the faculty's assessment policy. Assessment takes the form of written examinations designed to test the students' knowledge, insight, ability to use case law and legislation as appropriate, and understanding of the academic literature in the field. Skills are assessed in the International Law in Practice and Human Rights seminars as well as in the master's thesis. They are also tested in the UN Peacekeeping and Peace Enforcement, International Health Law, Advanced International Law, Investment and International Law, International Trade and Development Law, and International Criminal Tribunals and Courts courses, where the final assessment is or includes a paper and, in some of the courses, a presentation. Attendance at seminar sessions is compulsory for each of the seminars. The lecturer assesses the contributions of the students by reviewing each student's written paper while taking the oral presentation into account as well as the student's contributions to in-class discussions of the papers presented by other students in the seminar group. The master's thesis is assessed on the basis of the criteria mentioned on the thesis assessment form: content, argumentation, structure and design, comprehensiveness, attractiveness and accuracy of language, independence, originality and command of specific research skills.

The panel is satisfied with the assessment and evaluation system. During the site visit, it reviewed several examinations and confirmed that they are of an adequate master's level. The assessment methods used are in line with the learning outcomes, content and didactical design of the courses. They are sufficiently varied. The panel appreciates the fact that students have to write papers and give oral presentations throughout the programme.

The panel is positive about the manner of guaranteeing the reliability and validity of the testing. For example, there are always at least two examiners involved in preparing an exam. The correction of exams is almost always a joint activity, involving several lecturers evaluating the work of each individual student. The evaluation normally follows an answer model prepared in advance. The transparency is improved by determining the timing and type of a test before the start of the academic year. In addition, at least one recent exam is made available for each course, so students can judge the type and level of assessment. After every exam, a discussion is organised to give feedback on the outcome and allow students to review their work. The talks with students revealed that in general they are satisfied with the feedback. The feedback on written exams is limited by comparison.

During the site visit, the panel spoke with the staff about the manner of assessing the final projects. It was pleased to confirm that since the last assessment, the evaluation process has been better standardised and that a second assessor is always involved. Regarding the assessment form, it noted that the correspondence between the scores for criteria (indicated with plus and minus symbols) and the final grade is not very clear. In addition, the completed assessment forms contained little to no written clarification, impacting the transparency of the assessments. The panel recommends improving the assessment forms on these points.

The panel also discussed the possible introduction of a public defense as a formal conclusion of the thesis process and of the programme. Within the faculty, the bachelor's programme International and European Law has already introduced this, and it is highly appreciated by students and lecturers. The panel also values the public thesis defense, not only in a ceremonial sense, but above all with a view to strengthening the students' oral skills. The management emphasises that it is convinced of the added value, but that staff members need to be liberated for this. It intends to investigate whether a faculty-wide introduction is possible and desirable, which the panel appreciates.

A general point of attention concerning the assessment within the international master's programmes, including ILLIO, is the grading. Based on its interviews with students and staff as well as the inspected assessments and theses, the panel observed there are some clear variations in grading between master's programmes. According to the panel, the same amount of effort and a similar quality level are graded quite differently in the various master's programmes. The panel urges the programmes to strive for more uniformity. It advises organising a calibration of the grading.

Board of Examiners

The critical reflection states that the Faculty of Law has a single Board of Examiners for all programmes. This Board consists of nine members, including the chair and an external test expert, and an official secretary. It has an independent role in safeguarding the quality of assessment. It carries out this role by monitoring the pass percentages and subject evaluations for deviations; statistically analysing random samples of examination results, along with analysing unusual results; and examining the quality of random samples of theses and their assessments. Recently, it started evaluating the relationship between the intended learning outcomes of the programme as a whole and the testing based on programme dossiers. These are documents that reveal the link between the programme's learning outcomes and the courses' learning objectives. The dossiers include the learning outcomes, the course descriptions with learning objectives and literature, the exams and the course evaluations. In 2015, the Board initiated a benchmark for the evaluation of master's theses together with Radboud University Nijmegen. In it, the evaluation results of both universities are compared. As clarified by the interviewed members of the Board, the result was positive: in most cases, both the original assessors and those conducting the benchmark came to comparable results, with a margin of one point being considered acceptable.

The panel is positive about the functioning of the Board. It considers it a proactive, professional and hard-working committee. In the past period, the Board has taken a number of important steps to demonstrably ensure the quality of assessment, and it is clearly in control. The panel is also pleased with the programme dossiers. It realises that these files can make an important contribution to good quality control.

Considerations

The panel confirmed that the assessment and evaluation system of the master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations functions adequately. The content of the exams demonstrates an adequate master's level. The panel approves the types of assessment used. They are sufficiently varied and suit the content and design of the programme. Feedback on written assignments, including the master's thesis, could be improved. The evaluation of the theses is done properly, although the assessment form used could be made more transparent by clarifying the relation between the assessment of individual criteria and the overall score and by including space for qualitative remarks. The panel advises considering the introduction of a public oral thesis defense. It found some differences in the grading of written exams, papers and theses among the international master's programmes, including ILLIO. The panel advises organising a better calibration of the grading.

The quality control of assessment and evaluation is good. The panel approves the programme dossier, which reveals the relationship between the intended learning outcomes of the programme as a whole and the learning objectives, content and assessment of the individual courses. It also appreciated the various measures implemented to promote the reliability, validity and clarity of assessment, such as the four-eyes principle. It is positive about the functioning of the Board of Examiners, which is clearly in control.

Conclusion

Master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations: the panel assesses Standard 3 as 'satisfactory'.

Standard 4: Achieved learning outcomes

The programme demonstrates that the intended learning outcomes are achieved.

Explanation:

The level achieved is demonstrated by interim and final tests, final projects and the performance of graduates in actual practice or in post-graduate programmes.

Findings

Prior to the site visit, the panel studied a selection of 10 ILLIO master's theses, as well as the accompanying assessment forms completed by the supervisors. In the selection process, it paid attention to a wide spread of the marks. As mentioned under Standard 2, not all theses clearly justified the 18 EC awarded for them. In general, the panel agreed with the grades awarded by the supervisors. The grading seemed fair and reflected the differences in the students' work. The panel concluded that graduates achieved the required master's level. Most theses were adequately executed. Overall, their structure was logical, the problem definitions were formulated sufficiently clearly, the sources used were relevant, and the analyses tended to show in-depth understanding of the subjects under discussion.

As mentioned in the critical reflection, ILLIO was included in the faculty's 2016 alumni survey. The results showed that the graduates of this programme remain active in this field of specialisation. They either embark on a PhD or choose a professional career in an energy company or join a law firm. The available data suggest that the master's degree programme ILLIO delivers researchers who can also apply their knowledge and skills as academics or practitioners in a domestic, regional or international context.

During the site visit, the panel spoke (online) with a selection of alumni of the different English-taught master's programmes, including ILLIO. It learned from this conversation that the alumni were very enthusiastic about the programme. They felt well-prepared for their further careers, and most of them have done well in different relevant legal positions.

Considerations

The panel studied a selection of theses and found that the awarded grades generally matched its own evaluations. It concluded that the level achieved in the theses is satisfactory. They demonstrate a sufficiently academic attitude and understanding. They also testify to considerable skill in executing research and reporting on it. The interviewed alumni were positive about their programme, and the panel established that they are quite successful in their careers.

Conclusion

Master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations: the panel assesses Standard 4 as 'satisfactory'.

GENERAL CONCLUSION

The panel is positive about the new profile of the programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations, which includes two tracks: the more generally oriented track of Public International Law and the International Human Rights Law track. Although student numbers have increased, they remain relatively low, and the panel feels the small scale as well as the competition from other programmes make ILLIO somewhat vulnerable in terms of viability. It advises the faculty to re-evaluate ILLIO's position and profile in this context, particularly with regard to the other English-taught master's programmes. The intended learning outcomes match a master's level and orientation and are in agreement with the subject-specific reference framework. The outcomes are therefore in accordance with national as well as international standards. The panel appreciates the attention paid in the learning outcomes to the broader context in which (inter)national (non)governmental organizations or internationally operating companies function.

The panel considers the programme and the courses to be adequately designed. The programme is partly fixed, which safeguards its coherence. The tracks and optional courses give students the opportunity to tailor their studies towards their individual academic and professional preferences. The content is of an adequate master's level and enables students to achieve the learning outcomes. The panel is also satisfied with the academic as well as the professional orientation of the programme and the attention paid to the development of legal, academic and professional skills. It is positive about the connection to the professional field. It approves the teaching methods used but advises exploring ways to motivate students to start studying earlier and more actively, particularly in the first half of the programme. The International Health Law course could serve as an example of activating and innovative methods.

The programme is feasible, and the success rates are satisfactory. Students value the guidance and support provided by the staff and the International Office. The panel recommends looking into ways to facilitate international students looking for (extracurricular) internships. The international classroom contributes positively to a stimulating learning environment. The panel recommends exploring how the students' learning process could benefit more from environment. It established that attention should be paid to delays during the thesis process, partly due to a lack of firm deadlines. It advises introducing a more regulated thesis process. Furthermore, some students struggle with written assignments due to limited prior skills training. Students in the International Human Rights Law track particularly struggle with the seminar, which is scheduled at the start of the programme. The panel advises moving the seminar to the second half of the programme in order to give students and staff more time to prepare. It also recommends closely monitoring these students and taking action when necessary. It is pleased with the specialist, scientific and didactic qualities of the staff and the attention paid to their professionalization. There is a pleasant and collegial work climate in which many matters are discussed informally. The panel considers the staff-student ratio to be a cause for concern and recommends monitoring the workload of the staff and acting promptly to correct any problems.

The panel considers the assessment system adequate. The assessment methods are sufficiently varied and in line with the learning outcomes, content and didactical design of the courses. It is satisfied with the quality control of assessment and evaluation; in particular, the functioning of the Board of Examiners and the programme dossiers are exemplary. Feedback on written assignments, including the master's thesis, could be improved. The panel advises levelling out the perceived differences in the grading of written exams, papers and theses among the faculty's international master's programmes. The evaluation of the theses is done properly, but the assessment form could be made more transparent by clarifying the relation between the assessment of individual criteria and the overall score and by leaving more space for remarks. The panel also suggests reducing the number of credits for the thesis, for example from 18 to 12 EC. The quality of the master's theses is good to excellent. Graduates are satisfied with the programme and consider it to be a good starting point for their further careers. The panel concluded that the overall quality of the programme is satisfactory.

Conclusion

The panel assesses the master's programme International Law and the Law of International Organizations as 'satisfactory'.

APPENDIX 2: DOMAIN-SPECIFIC FRAMEWORK OF REFERENCE

Introduction

This document outlines the Subject-specific Reference Framework for Law. The framework sets out the basic principles that degree programmes must use when setting their curricula. It indicates what may be expected in terms of the content and the level of the programmes, what they aim to achieve and what wider society can thus expect from a law graduate at Bachelor's and Master's level. The framework has been written explicitly for university Bachelor's and Master's programmes which are part of the Quality Inspections Group for Law (Visitatiegroep Rechtsgeleerdheid) by virtue of the final attainment levels they themselves have chosen, or which wish to join it in the context of the initial accreditation process for new programmes (Toets nieuwe opleiding).

The framework does not provide an exhaustive list of areas of law or legally relevant areas of focus to which the programmes must restrict themselves. Equally, it does not seek to offer rankings, answers to discussions of methodology or instructions on how programmes should meet professional requirements. It is up to each individual programme to provide an indication of where it considers itself to be on the global map of law. In formal terms, a programme achieves this by means of its academic and examination regulations and in materials included in the documents submitted to independent quality inspection committees when applying to be assessed for the purposes of accreditation.

What this framework does attempt to offer is a blueprint of what the academic world and wider society can expect from a graduate, academically-qualified lawyer – and therefore also from a programme in Law – in terms of knowledge, attitudes and skills. The fact that the framework has been revised in no way implicates that programmes offered in accordance with the old framework are outdated. On the contrary, since even the previous framework urged programmes to be open to new developments such as the globalization and digitization of society. However, the new framework places greater emphasis on describing the knowledge, attitudes and skills that relate to contemporary developments and challenges programmes to demonstrate these in their objectives and final attainment levels.

By publishing this Subject-specific Reference Framework, the Consultation Body for Law (Disciplineoverleg Rechtsgeleerdheid) hopes on the one hand to have provided independent quality inspection committees that will need to conduct programme assessments within the Quality Inspection Group in the years ahead with an effective basis for doing so. On the other hand, the framework offers the essential room for manoeuvre for the separate programmes offered within the Quality Inspection Group for Law to adopt their own distinctive approach.

Utrecht, December 2015

On behalf of the Council of Law Deans

Professor dr. A.M. Hol,
Chairperson

Realization

On 18 December 2015, the consultative body of the Council of Law Deans (abbreviated in Dutch to RDR) agreed to this Subject-specific Reference Framework for programme assessments within the Quality Inspection Group for academic programmes in Law. It offers a joint framework of subject-specific requirements for all Bachelor's and Master's programmes offered by the Law faculties at Dutch universities. This Subject-specific Reference Framework supersedes its predecessor, agreed by the then Council of Law Deans, in December 2009.

In the rest of this document, the term 'programme' is exclusively intended to mean a degree programme that is included in the Netherlands Central Register of Higher Education Study Programmes (Centraal Register Opleidingen Hoger Onderwijs, CROHO). Any references to the term 'lawyer' refer to academically-qualified lawyers, unless otherwise specified.

1. Law programmes and professions in the wider social context

Bachelor's and Master's programmes in Law aim to educate and train lawyers who are competent in the discipline and engaged in wider society, have a critical, academic mind, and are capable of analysing problem scenarios independently in order to formulate a solution. To achieve this, they not only need to apply analysis and critical evaluation to their thinking: they also need to be capable of synthetic, abstract thought. It is essential that the academic level and relevance to society of the programme is guaranteed. Communication, information and research skills all play an essential role in the programmes and there must be sufficient emphasis on current developments in terms of their social background. As such, the academic programme leading to the qualification of lawyer must be seen in context, so to speak.

The relationship between the law and wider society is in a continuous state of flux. Society is pluralistic and globally-oriented, as a result of which it is becoming increasingly complex. This trend also applies to the law. The days when law in the Netherlands encompassed Dutch legislation and case law alone are long gone and it is now equally affected by international and European legislation and case law, in the form of policy regulations, recommendations, covenants, self-regulation, European harmonization, the influence of comparative law, etc. Citizens have become empowered, the number of legal regulations continues to increase and society is strongly influenced by a trend towards juridification. As a result of European integration and globalization, European law and international law are becoming increasingly important. The 21st-century information society and its legal problems, as well as the expectations placed on the law by society, are decreasingly affected by national borders at the same time as the traditional boundaries in the legal and social sense are regaining ground. In whatever context he or she enters employment, a graduate lawyer needs to be increasingly aware of and responsive to other countries' legal systems and cultures.

Within the Quality Inspections Group for Law, programmes are offered that meet the demand for lawyers with a broad academic training – generalists – especially for the purposes of first-line consultancy and policy preparation and in numerous other positions across the labour market. There are also specialized Master's programmes which produce graduates capable of developing into academically-trained specialists who compare favourably in their field with their academic professional counterparts anywhere in the world. Finally, there are programmes that are actually more focused on broadening the area of law covered by the programme.

Lawyers work in a wide range of positions and roles. Indeed, there are greater numbers of lawyers working outside the traditional legal professions rather than within. The Law programmes prepare graduates for these traditional professions, but increasingly also for a variety of other activities that call for an academic attitude, critical analysis, skills in writing and speaking, and where legal expertise is desirable. They, therefore, no longer focus solely on the professional requirements for the Bar, judiciary, taxation and notarial profession which are generally seen as the traditional legal professions, although these form the core of certain programmes. All programmes aim to achieve effective coordination with the labour market by maintaining strong links with the wider professional field they serve. In addition to internships and career orientation, this encompasses contacts with professional organizations and employers, advisory councils, alumni and guest lecturers. In addition, a graduate Bachelor of Laws must be adequately equipped with the research and other skills required to gain admission to a Master's programme in Law and subsequently to a PhD programme, despite the fact that only a small portion of graduates opt for a career in research.

In the more than ten years that the Bachelor/Master system has been in place in the Netherlands, no specific career prospects for an academically-qualified Bachelor in Law have emerged and there is no clearly identifiable labour market for graduates equipped only with an academic Bachelor's degree in Law (LL.B). Many LL.B graduates work in an environment where knowledge of law is relevant, but so far no specific requirements for professional skills from a Bachelor's programme have emerged as a result of this. The labour market for academically-qualified lawyers still shows a preference for lawyers who have qualified to Master's level. As a result, a large majority of students studying Law at university opt to complete a Master's programme after the Bachelor. This is not only because of the greater prospects this offers in the labour market, but also because it is a statutory requirement for access to the traditional legal professions.

Nevertheless, Bachelor's programmes still also aim to prepare students for their future life as lawyers. This can be achieved by including aspects of that professional practice in the content and composition of the curriculum, but also by means of extracurricular activities and career preparation.

With the advent of higher professional education (HBO) programmes in areas of the law, a lawyer is no longer necessarily someone with a university certificate that qualifies them for the traditional legal professions (prosecuting lawyers and the judiciary; the Bar; the notarial profession, tax consultants); a Master of Laws (meester in de rechten, mr.). Although lawyers qualified to HBO level are entitled to use the title of Bachelor of Laws (LL.B), there is a distinct difference between the HBO programmes and the academic programmes in Law. What distinguishes them is that the academic programmes lay the foundations for mastering the legal research method, as expressed in the final attainment levels of the programmes. This is mainly reflected in the content of the programme, its depth and its approach to the law. Academic Bachelor's and Master's programmes focus on educating lawyers who have learned how to think independently and critically, who not only learn to find answers to questions, but also continue to question the answers they find. Access to the traditional legal professions is regulated by statute and requires both an academic Bachelor's degree (LL.B) and the Master of Laws degree (LL.M).¹

In the Netherlands, lawyers with the LL.M qualification will generally use the equivalent Dutch title meester in de rechten (mr.), especially when working in the traditional legal professions.

2. Possibilities for national and international comparison

Globally and within Europe, programmes in Law are characterized by their highly varied context and structure, together with significant differences in terms of admission and the duration of study. In addition, all countries have separate regulations governing graduate lawyers' access to the Bar, the judiciary, tax law and the notarial profession, which have an influence on both the orientation and the intended final level. Of course, it is possible to compare the curricula of different programmes, but a serious international benchmark for objectives, level and orientation for programmes in Law currently remains impossible.

The German CHE benchmark organization is not open to programmes in Law in other countries, despite the fact that this is possible for other disciplines.² The EU project Tuning Sectoral Framework for Social Sciences also failed to reach a harmonized set of final attainment levels for programmes in Law.³ In other countries, several national benchmarks for programmes in Law do exist, including the Benchmarks for Law in the United Kingdom, which stipulates the knowledge, skills and attitude required by Bachelor's and Master's graduates for quality assessment and accreditation of programmes there.⁴ In any case, these are only of limited use for programmes in continental Europe because of the major differences between the common law and civil law legal systems.

There is no doubt that the Bologna and Lisbon Agreements had a harmonizing impact on the content of legal education in the EU. As part of the accession process to the EU, new EU member states have frequently based their programmes on the Bachelor/Master structure in advance, and the old member states are still in the process of reforming and harmonizing their education systems. In this, they sometimes opt for solutions that actually hamper comparability between different countries, as in the example of Germany, which is moving towards a more varied assortment of programmes.⁵

All of this would suggest that a serious international comparison of the objectives, level and orientation of programmes in Law remains impossible or at least of little use.

With regard to the comparison of programmes in the Netherlands itself, it is possible to say that there is a lot of sharing of information and coordination between the faculties of Law in the Netherlands, including on such areas as educational renewal, research, the interpretation of accreditations and the configuration of professional requirements. There is regular national consultation between the Deans in the RDR, as an offshoot of which those responsible for education and the directors of operations meet when necessary to discuss education-related, organizational and financial subjects and share experiences and information. Finally, there are regular national consultations and coordination at administrative level in the National Policy-workers Consultation Body (Landelijk Overleg Beleidsmedewerkers). In addition, the RDR and separate faculties also take advantage of good practice examples identified by the panels conducting independent quality inspections and included in their assessment reports to the NVAO (Accreditation Organization of the Netherlands and Flanders). The RDR also engages in discussion with representatives from the varied professional field it serves. For example, it consults with the Council for the Judiciary (Raad voor de Rechtspraak) and the Netherlands Bar Association (Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten) in order to determine a standard to define the applicable statutory provisions for the so-called civil effect of programmes in Law. This takes the form of a covenant.

As such, it is possible to argue that some kind of national benchmarking does take place, generally of an informal nature, except in the case of national independent quality inspections and the restrictions relating to the aforementioned covenant. In that context, the Discipline Consultation Body also undertakes formal duties.

3. Professional requirements

Access to the judiciary, the Bar and the notarial profession is regulated by and in accordance with statute. In practical terms, this means that requirements are set for the organization of Bachelor's and Master's programmes intended to enable admission to higher programmes that prepare for positions in the judiciary, the Bar, the notarial profession and tax law.

The programmes that opt to prepare for these higher programmes stipulate this in their academic and examination regulations by emphatically including within them the statutory professional requirements and the further definition of these in the covenant described above. The examination boards for these programmes will issue specific statements to this effect, on the basis of which the higher programmes can determine whether a programme fulfils the intended requirements.

4. Final attainment levels for Bachelor's and Master's programmes

Every Law programme makes choices when setting its final attainment levels based on national and relevant international comparisons of final attainment levels and in an attempt to achieve the best possible match with what is a very diverse professional field. These final attainment levels are included in the academic and examination regulations of each separate programme. They include at least three categories.

A. Knowledge and understanding

The graduate lawyer is proficient in the key tenets of the area or areas of law on which the programme focuses. This applies equally to their material and formal and the historical and theoretical aspects.

However, one-dimensional knowledge alone is not sufficient. Programmes therefore aim to develop a 'genuine understanding of the law' in their students, in an academic environment in which 'why' questions are allowed to flourish. This means that, alongside the subject-specific knowledge referred to above, methods are also taught which enable students to keep abreast of the latest relevant developments and changes. The education can also encompass an understanding of the differences between major legal families (such as those between common law and civil law), of the historical and philosophical evolution of the law and, insofar as the nature of the programme requires or permits it, also of comparative law methodology. This means that the graduate lawyer must always be capable of updating his or her legal knowledge on a permanent basis and possibly also specialize in new areas.

B. Academic and legal skills

The above assumes an increasing focus on acquiring academic and legal skills: lifelong learning and the acquisition of an international attitude. It also assumes that the graduate lawyer is capable of reflecting on the law and translating issues in society into the language that the law uses to solve such issues. During the programme, students are encouraged to search for questions and problems as well as answers and solutions; they are given an opportunity to develop capacities of analysis and learn to think, write and present in a critical way.

The ability to formulate and solve a legal case is also essential. To achieve this, the graduate lawyer must be able to effectively collect, process and evaluate the relevant facts and evidence, and apply the rules of law to them. The lawyer is expected to be capable of legally interpreting a problem in society and outlining potential solutions.

In addition, a lawyer must be capable of conveying his or her legal knowledge and legal judgment both orally and in writing to other lawyers and in other professional environments. This means that language is the lawyer's main working tool. Effective and clear verbal and written proficiency in the Dutch language (or in English if that is the language of instruction for the programme or part of it) is essential. For this, students must have an opportunity during their programme, if relevant for the specific programme, to acquire knowledge of English legal terminology in the current social context.

c. Academic citizenship/attitude

During the programme, the prospective lawyer should become fully acquainted with the legal culture or cultures. He or she should be enabled to develop an ethical professional attitude and be aware of the social context in which the law operates and, related to that, his or her responsibility within society. The teaching and educational environment assists the student in this. It is important for education to be structured in such a way that it sparks an interest in wider society and evokes a natural curiosity for legal issues and legal thinking, as well as for the role that law plays in society.

5. Final level

Programmes need to be transparent regarding how students are able to reach the final level and how they can demonstrate that they have reached it. Test results, assignments and presentations form the primary basis for this.

For Bachelor's programmes in Law, the final level achieved is also reflected in the thesis, dissertation or final project. Responding to a legal question with the help of recognized legal methods and reporting on the underlying research conducted form the main basis for this.

The Bachelor's thesis or its equivalent does not aim to demonstrate that the final attainment levels of the Bachelor's programme have been reached. Some important skills, such as communication, are not tested and neither is the student's understanding of all areas of the law that are of relevance to the Bachelor's programme. Moreover, most Bachelors' programmes in Law award only relatively few credits for this final assignment. In Bachelor's programmes in Law, the acquisition of research skills, in the form of methodology and technique courses, does not generally play a central role. Acquiring research skills is part of the general academic education of lawyers and primarily occurs through the handling of the separate areas of the law. Programmes are at liberty to emphasize certain areas in order to reflect the distinctive appeal of a particular programme, which in turn will be expressed in the final assignment.

The same applies for the Master's thesis, although it differs in generally placing greater emphasis on the development of research skills, if only in view of the fact that achieving any Master's degree in Law in principle enables access to a PhD programme. Alongside the regular Master's programmes, specialist research Master's programmes also exist, which place specific emphasis on the acquisition of research skills. The further in-depth study required for other areas of academic professional practice is in any case only really achieved in the Master's phase. This is expressed in the position played in the curriculum by the Master's thesis, the greater number of credits generally set aside for the final assignment in the Master's programme and the requirements set with regard to its contents.

6. General characteristics and objectives of Bachelor's and Master's programmes

It has already been pointed out above that the range of programmes is varied, in terms of their number, the chosen specializations and their emphasis. This does not detract from the fact that programmes in Law have, and must have, characteristics in common. These characteristics need not necessarily be present to the same extent in each programme, but they must at least be reflected at the core of each programme. The specific approach adopted by programmes in this regard is stipulated in the academic and examination regulations for the programme .

In Bachelor's programmes in Law, the following characteristics play a central role:

- a. the social function of the law;
- b. the core concepts in the most important areas of law: private law, constitutional law, administrative law, criminal law, European law, international law and, for tax-related and notarial programmes, tax law;
- c. the law as a coherent system;
- d. the theoretical basic principles and historical development of the law and, for tax-related and notarial programmes, the economic aspects of the law.

Master's programmes in Law involve further in-depth study of knowledge relating to one or several areas of the law or specific subjects within them. Key characteristics include:

- e. the social function of the area covered by the programme, its boundaries and related areas;
- f. more intensive or extensive study of core concepts in one or several areas of the law (private law, constitutional law, administrative law, criminal law, European law and international law);
- g. the position of the area of the law covered within the system of the law as a whole;
- h. the theoretical basic principles and historical development of the law and, for tax-related and notarial programmes, the economic aspects of the law.

Academic programmes in Law also aim to achieve the following:

- i. the acquisition of knowledge and understanding of the law, in which law is considered also in its European, international and comparative law context;
- j. reflecting on the boundaries of the law as well as its related areas;
- k. acquiring academic and legal skills. In this context, this is understood to mean:
 - 1. the capacity to think about the law as an academic;
 - 2. the ability to communicate with fellow lawyers and non-lawyers based on the knowledge and understanding acquired, making use of an analytical attitude and outstanding speaking and writing skills;
 - 3. the ability to apply a relevant set of academic tools;
 - 4. the ability to participate in an academic debate;
 - 5. the ability to gather, evaluate, process and apply knowledge;
 - 6. the ability to apply specific knowledge of an area of the law in a wider academic, historical, philosophical, ethical and socio-cultural context;
 - 7. the ability to deal critically with the rules of law and case law, and seek out and find new solutions;
 - 8. the ability to keep abreast of and explore new developments and new areas of the law;
 - 9. the ability to deal with the increasing globalization, Europeanization and internationalization of the law;
- l. the development of academic citizenship that includes an understanding of a professional ethical attitude and awareness of the social context in which the law operates, as well as the social responsibility that this implies for the academically-qualified lawyer.
